The "Les Misinformed" Story

Early in the late eighteenth century a trio of writers (A. Pompous Blohard, A. Nany Mous and Stephen Flatulence) set out to the task of creating a show which would encompass the complete theatre experience; a show which people could watch while eating, drinking and socializing with their closest and dearest friends in a cozy environment. These three writers died late in the early nineteenth century, poverty stricken and under almost universal derision. It wasn't until the late middle of the twentieth century that their closest decendants(A. Pompous Blohard IV, A. Nany Mous IV and Stephen Flatulence IV) stumbled upon their ideas and invented the T.V. dinner, which allowed people to eat while drinking, socializing and watching a show. This in turn, created a gargantuan upheaval in the food preparation industry as well as a massive financial empire which now encompasses international shipping, food service, Third World Governments and a controlling share in Carnegie-Mellon University.

How ironic that none of this should be related to the true story of how "Les Misinformed" came into being. It is even more ironic that now three writers (Federico Hattoum, Javier Grillo-Marxuach and Frank Schurter) from Scotch 'n' Soda, the theatre group of this school in which the T.V. dinner people have a controlling share, have taken it upon themselves to create a show which en compasses the complete theatre experience; a show which people can watch while eating, drinking and socializing with their closest and dearest friends in a cozy environment without having ever heard of the three writers who originally envisioned this idea.

It therefore stands to reason that these three writers not be expelled from Carnegie-Mellon on the grounds of plagiarism, since, as we have stated before, they really had no idea that it had all been thought of already. Please show mercy, we do not want to be crushed by the chiefs of a multi-national food preparation conglomerate.
